Dear Friend:

America is special. It is an exceptional, one-of-a-kind, land of opportunity, and I know you would agree that we should keep it that way. I credit the U.S. Constitution with providing the backbone that makes America strong, and we must be vigilant in our defense against those who might trample the structure for freedom that our founding fathers created for us. No one understood the meaning of freedom better than that first group of patriots who rose in opposition to a tyrannical government and built the Republic in which we are so fortunate to live today. We must continue to defend the freedom that they and many others have fought to provide. To do so, we must stand up against any erosion of the Constitution, no matter how large or small. This month, I joined almost seventy of my House colleagues in protesting President Obama's decision to disregard the rule of law by appointing Richard Cordray as the Chairman of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau (CFPB) and three other officials to posts on the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB). You can read my statements on this matter in their entirety by clicking here.

I remain hopeful that this year will be the year that the White House sets aside partisanship and seeks common ground. When it does that, we will succeed in advancing policy that will truly benefit the American people. This week, the President delivered his annual State of the Union Address where he expressed his desire to work together with Congress to deliver the solutions America needs. You can read my full remarks on the address by clicking here. The President's decisions over the past month do not leave me entirely convinced that his actions will match his rhetoric.

As we move into 2012, know that I will continue to defend your freedoms rather than pass new mandates. I will need the conservative guidance of the Seventh District in 2012. We must take advantage of every opportunity for us to work together—from in-person events to telephone town halls, and everything in between. Please continue to reach out with your thoughts and concerns. Protecting freedom is a team effort—I cannot work on your behalf without hearing from you. My door is always open, please never hesitate to knock.

The Seventh District's commitment to freedom remains unparalleled, and I remain yours in service. Thank you for all that you do.

Sincerely,

Rob Woodall
